Fuzzy stuff -- stardust, marbles, raisins -- that an observer might consider harmless until he gets that prickly feeling on his back. But nearly all of these things have one thing in common: they can carry a small amount of energy when they collide. NASA/JPL-Caltech/T. Pyle NASA's Curiosity rover today successfully touched down ## on the surface of Mars. The lander is on its way to gather data to help scientists determine the kinds of environments on the planet that might have supported microbial life in the past, and then make sense of the stardust there to see if any of the organic molecules on Earth today may have come from the Red Planet. Image credit: NASA/JPL-Caltech/T. Pyle But even the landing itself -- massive as it was -demonstrated a tiny version of a planet where things happen in the blink of an eye. Space agencies have estimated that there are at least ten million comets and space dust particles bigger than a grain of sand on the surface of the Earth. This material can be detected with the naked eye. But in comets, interstellar dust, and planetary "showers," the massive outpouring of matter that comes from the Sun every 11 years, there is another kind of dust: the tenmicrometer-size stuff that
